Rule of Thumb for Evaluating Quotes

The internet makes it easy to compare trip quotes. However, it's a double-edge sword. On one hand, you are able to easily and quickly find companies and gather multiple quotes; on the other hand, anyone can set up a website and offer low "bait and switch" price. Here a good rule of thumb when reviewing your quotes.

LOW QUOTES

If a rate seem too good to be true it usually is. The lowest quote is likely based on subpar accommodations, fast food meals, mediocre customer service, and so on. Also, as your itinerary comes together, you may face unanticipated fees, undisclosed charges and up sell pressure. While it may appear that you will save money, you may pay more in the long run.

HIGH QUOTES

If a quote is too high it's likely inflated by unnecessary "bells and whistles", bloated overhead costs, hidden compensation, and high profit margin. The company companies is probably extremely revenue-driven, rather than customer-service driven. You can expect to face a lot of upfront promises and sales pressure to secure the sale. However, you may still face subpar trip features, because these companies tend to look for anyway to increase their profit margins.

AVERAGE QUOTES

Savvy trip planners look for a solid company that offers a value-driven competitive quote and exceptional service. The best group travel companies tend to offer rates that are not too high or too low, they are just right. They tend to be based on providing maximum trip value at the best rate for each participant. These companies tend to be driven by customer service rather than maximum profit margins.
